PHYTOCHEMICAL EVALUATION OF HERBAL EXTRACT

Kunal Sharad Surwade

KCT's R. G. Sapkal Institute of Pharmacy, Nashik

ABSTRACT

Phytochemical screening of plant extracts revealed the presence of alkaloid, steroids, terpenoids and cardiac glycosides. Quantitative determination of total phenolics, total flavonoids and various in vitro antioxidant activities of methanolic extract was carried out using various methods. Phytochemical evaluation of plant extract can be done by analyzing qualitative and quantitative properties. Most of the plants having antioxidant properties with their alcoholic and aqueous extracts of various parts of plants. The quantitative phytochemical analysis of this species exhibited the presence of alkaloids, total phenolics, flavonoids, tannins, saponins and ascorbic acid in considerable quantity. The basic aim to study phytochemical evaluation of herbal extract is to study the antioxidant, antimicrobial, antidiabetic, anti-inflammatory, and analgesic activities.

ABSTRACT

The work conducted on modified and further purified natural gum material from the plant authenticated as Vateria indica and Pistacia lantiscus was characterized for Glass transition Temperature and Swelling Index study. Glass transition temperature is a property of the amorphous materials or the amorphous portion of semi-crystalline materials. Results of both the purified gums shows optimum Glass transition Temperature and Swelling Index to go further microencapsulation study may be using solvent evaporation method. Modified and further purified natural gum material from the plant authenticated as Vateria indica and Pistacia lantiscus was characterized for Angle of repose and Compressibility study. Microcapsules of modified natural material from Vateria indica and Pistacia lantiscus with suitable model drug was prepared by solvent evaporation method. Prepared microcapsules are free flowing and non-sticky. Developed drug loaded microcapsules from modified natural material from Vateria indica and Pistacia lantiscus by solvent evaporation method using selected model drug was evaluated for entrapment efficiency (Drug loading efficiency), Particle size and angle of repose and tested for Scanning electron microscopy and drug release study.
